CONTAINMENT LINES

Updated Mar 19, 2026

Geometric straight lines attempt to impose order on eroding, fragmentary topography. Curved organic forms push against the boundaries created by geometric structure. The composition is a struggle between two contradictory logics: the desire to contain and organize versus the reality of dissolution and disorder.

Neither logic wins fully. The lines do not contain the organic forms; erosion does not obliterate structure. They coexist in uneasy tension, each acknowledging the other's power.

Containment Lines: the futility of control against geological forces — a tension that can never be resolved, only briefly suspended.

Containment Lines shows order's last resistance — geometric lines attempting to contain eroding topography. Neither logic wins; they coexist in uneasy tension, briefly suspended, never resolved.

Containment Lines is part of Cartography of Collapse, a series of 16 original ink drawings on paper (2026) tracing geological transformation from formation through dissolution. Created in a single session without revision — the irreversible line mirroring the irreversibility of geological processes.

Each drawing is improvised, capturing moments in matter's transformation across deep time. The series moves in two acts: igneous (formation, density, compression) and Erosion (dissolution, dispersal, return to void).

Certificate of Authenticity included with acquisition.
